The Evening World cabled to John E. Redmond, leader of the Irish Parliamentary Party, and T. P. O'Connor, M. P., for their views on the prospects of Home Rule judging from the results of the British elections to date. The following replies were received late this afternoon:

The result of the elections so far is full of hope for Ireland. All the leading Anti-Home Rulers and Coercionists are defeated. The overwhelming majority of the Liberals returned are friends of Ireland. The great increase of Labor members is most valuable to us. All of them are stanch Home Rulers, and have been returned by the Irish vote in Great Britain. Irish votes also defeated Balfour and Long. We are most grateful for the sympathy and aid of all our friends in America. JOHN E. REDMOND.

We have profound belief and hope that the results of the elections mean the beginning of the end of the Irish struggle for liberty. A good administration can, without legislation, restore 4,000 evicted tenants to their homes and farms, and with non-contentious legislation it can solve the congested districts' problem in two or three years. The big Liberal majority can give Ireland a good measure of self-government in spite of the House of Lords. T. P. O'CONNOR.
